

r grows to 105 exhibitors, thousands of visitors

also be in attendance with stations in each building, including one for the center for lifelong learning.

Congressional representatives Marcy Kaptur and Matthew Barrett will have tables as well as Senator Sue Morano. Kaptur, who attended the 2007 Senior Living Fair, will be making a special appearance again this year.

"That's neat because it brings some attention to this end of the county," Graham said.

According to Graham, many medical and legal specialists will also be on site to offer advice. Senior law attorney Gail Reeves will be presenting two 20-minute seminars about topics of interest to seniors, one on estate planning and another about long-term care. Area hospitals and ambulance districts will provide free health screenings and blood pressure checks along with a nurse who will be able to answer prescription and medical questions.

All of the events, exhibitors and topics featured at the fair will be geared toward seniors, but Graham said she welcomes anyone who has an interest in aging to attend.

"It's not just limited to seniors, anybody can come," she said. "It's a great thing for caregivers and families who have concerns about things like estate planning and Medicare."

The Southern Satellite Office on Aging provides other services outside the Senior Fair as well, Graham said, and was responsible in part for helping to deliver meals on wheels into the townships of Brighton, Huntington and Penfield. Their services are based upon need and not income, she said, and seniors who sign up with the office for free can receive help with things like light housework and home repairs every couple weeks, major home repairs and cleaning twice a year and transportation to and from doctor's appointments.
